This expansion requires a group of people more zealous than most Americans in its pursuit. Neoconservatives advocated policies to meet each of these challenges: a military buildup to reverse the impression of American weakness that the debacle in Vietnam had produced; across-the-board reductions in marginal income tax rates to restore economic incentives; monetary restraint to end high inflation and prevent people from being pushed into higher tax brackets without making any real income gains. A further consideration is that traditional methods may not always yield the most practical responses

Politics, for Oakeshott, belongs to the mode of practice, along with religion. See all of this author's posts. Unless we reinforce and support clear norms for adulthood—marriage, family, work, community involvement, patriotic loyalty—then the disoriented middle of the middle, no matter how economically self-sufficient, will become increasingly dependent on bureaucratic and therapeutic support and guidance, which means more government. Second is the conservative tradition of promoting healthy mediating institutions.

But that was because of World War II. Tradition represents for conservatives a continuum enmeshing the individual and social, and is immune to reasoned critique; the radical intellectual is therefore arrogant and dangerous. It is sceptical about proposals of reform based on a priori commitment to a value such as freedom or equality.
